Second Growth Redwood Worthy of Good Management Practices To Obtain Perpetual Income

Emerson P. Fritts

Once thought worthless, second growth redwood suddenly demonstrated value and there are now more than a dozen small mills cutting such growth successfully.

The typical second growth redwood forest now being cut is a mixture of residual special trees and seedling trees of several species, due to the cutting practices of earlier times, and must loggers and to the accidental free- dom from fires.

Present Logging Too Close

Most owners are selling their second-growth redwood limited until they can contract on the trees with the loggers to be clearcut.
